

Diamond

Being stuck in the Nevada desert with hundreds of other cats, and terribly neglected, would be hard for anyone. But to be there without the human affection that she needs as much as food and water must have been unbearable for this sweet girl. Diamond was part of the Great Kitty Rescue in Pahrump, Nevada and came to Shadow Cats with a group of feline leukemia kitties through the Best Friends organization in 2007.

When she arrived at the sanctuary, Diamond was in a constant frantic state, at least whenever people were around. She would do anything and everything to get your attention - jumping, climbing up your leg, constantly talking to you (well, OK - shouting at you). A year later, though, she has settled into life here. She is still very outgoing - no one ever had to ask twice to get her into their lap - and quite the talker. But she's no longer frantic, because she realizes that she is now in a good place and can count on being well cared for and knows she'll get plenty of attention from all the volunteers. If you didn't know better, though, you would swear that she deliberately poses for the KittyCam because she's so easy to spot with her bright coat.....check her out!
